

Tune In, Turn On, Throw Up?

Contributed by
Sunday, 21 January 2007

It was only a matter of time before some visionary decided to manufacture musical condoms, but that doesn't mean we have to sing their praises for it. The sheaths, which come in a variety of colors and corresponding flavors (including mint, strawberry, chocolate and banana) also come with their very own soundtracks. Listening to acid jazz gets you hot? Well now you can buy protection specifically designed to suit your own sonic sexual needs.

The condoms don't actually play the tunes (no one is winning any engineering awards here) but they come packaged with an 18-minute-long soundtrack of tunes from the musical genre that turns you on. The music starts slow, then medium, then becomes fast before getting slow again, said Jack Wong, who helped with the music. Whether this is long enough or not, really depends on the individual, compilation designer Jack Wong says.

So where can you get your hands on a package of chillout condoms? Not your neighborhood drug store. These sophisticated items are sold in book and record stores, clubs with covers and only in suitably posh cities like Hong Kong, London, Paris, and Amsterdam. We're targeting more lifestyle stores, rather than 7-11s and pharmacies, says company rep Victor Tsang. There's a market gap in the condom industry that we may be able to make fun of and also penetrate.

Would you buy goods from a condom salesman that uses the word penetrate without irony?

It was only a matter of time before some visionary decided to manufacture musical condoms, but that doesn't mean we have to sing their praises for it. The sheaths, which come in a variety of colors and corresponding flavors (including mint, strawberry, chocolate and banana) also come with their very own soundtracks. Listening to acid jazz gets you hot? Well now you can buy protection specifically designed to suit your own sonic sexual needs.

The condoms don't actually play the tunes (no one is winning any engineering awards here) but they come packaged with an 18-minute-long soundtrack of tunes from the musical genre that turns you on. The music starts slow, then medium, then becomes fast before getting slow again, said Jack Wong, who helped with the music. Whether this is long enough or not, really depends on the individual, compilation designer Jack Wong says.

So where can you get your hands on a package of chillout condoms? Not your neighborhood drug store. These sophisticated items are sold in book and record stores, clubs with covers and only in suitably posh cities like Hong Kong, London, Paris, and Amsterdam. We're targeting more lifestyle stores, rather than 7-11s and pharmacies, says company rep Victor Tsang. There's a market gap in the condom industry that we may be able to make fun of and also penetrate.

Would you buy goods from a condom salesman that uses the word penetrate without irony?